

DESIGN DIRECTION COMPARISON

Three Prototypes, Side by Side

Advocate Arjun Mehta — a fictional placeholder identity used consistently across all three directions, so this comparison is about design, not content. All three are static prototypes prepared for review; nothing on them is real.

CONVERSATIONS IN

PHOTOGRAPH USED FOR ILLUSTRATIVE PURPOSES ONLY.

Wisdom, discretion and quiet confidence — the sense of a senior, independent practitioner who does not need to raise his voice to be taken seriously. Unhurried on purpose, not old-fashioned.

KEY STRENGTHS

- A single vertical “docket” rail runs down every page
- Practice areas and matters set as a ruled schedule, not cards
- Only one full-bleed dark section on the whole site — the footer

BEST SUITED FOR

An advocate positioning himself as an established, independent generalist litigator — someone whose main asset is judgment built up over years, appearing personally before the High Court and in arbitration. Suits a practitioner comfortable with a slower, literary voice. Not the right fit for a practice wanting to foreground speed, technology, or a large advisory team.

Precise, current, unfussy — the kind of independent counsel a founder or a CFO would be comfortable forwarding to their board. Contemporary enough to feel like a practice that understands how businesses run; restrained enough to read as serious.

KEY STRENGTHS

- A hairline rule-and-tick opens every section — one signature, used sparingly
- Label-left / content-right records replace card grids throughout
- Stock photography colour-graded toward the cool mineral palette

BEST SUITED FOR

An advocate whose clients are businesses, founders and institutions rather than individuals — someone who does advisory work alongside disputes and wants the site to read as commercially fluent. Less suited to a practice built on personal or family matters, where warmth should lead.

Empathetic, attentive and accessible, without slipping into casual or sentimental. A visitor should feel this is a serious professional who will explain things properly, work with them directly, and say plainly when settlement is the better route.

KEY STRENGTHS

- Every formal heading is paired with a plain-language restatement
- Portrait and section-break image are arch-cropped, echoing the architecture
- “What happens after you contact the office” is a full section, not fine print

BEST SUITED FOR

An advocate whose work brings him into contact with individuals and families rather than only institutions — succession, partition of family property, tenancy, and civil disputes where the parties still have to deal with one another afterward. The wrong choice for a practice positioning itself primarily for corporate clients or panel work.

MAKING A SELECTION

Any of these responses is useful to us:

- “I prefer Prototype 1.”
- “I prefer the structure of 2, but the warmth of 3.”
- “I like the typography from 1 and the navigation from 2.”
- “None of these — here is what I'd want instead.”

Once a direction (or combination) is chosen, we move to replacing every placeholder with your real details — see the accompanying Client Content Questionnaire.
